Search form You are here Frank Palermo Frank Palermo was born in Lowell, Massachusetts in 1897 and moved to Tacoma, Washington in the early 1920s. He worked in the fishing industry as a commercial fisherman, and later as a lobsterman and refrigeration repairman. During World War II, he worked at Boeing and became an early designer of the B-17 Flying Fortress. After the war, Frank Palermo opened his own company designing and building B-17s and later other military aircraft. He worked at Wright Aeronautical at Long Beach, California as a civilian research engineer for a few years. In the late 1950s and early 1960s, Palermo was involved in forming a group called The Heritage Aircraft Association to promote the building and restoration of historic aircraft. He became a member of the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association (AOPA), and helped establish the Puget Sound Chapter. Frank Palermo died in 2004, at the age of 93. His papers are in the care of the Everett Public Library, Everett, Washington, and an oral history interview of him is in the collection of the Boeing Historical Museum. Of the many economic developments taking place in China during the past several years, arguably the most significant has been the phenomenal pace of economic growth. With growth rates averaging close to 10 percent for the last several years, one has been left to wonder: what's not to like about it? What's more, growth has not been uniform, with growth in the eastern half of China largely paced by inward investment and expansion of the domestic service sector. In the west, however, growth rates have remained more subdued, but have nevertheless been robust. Perhaps this has something to do with the development of the western economy and the fate of the Chinese economy in the west. For much of the past few decades, the western economy was and continues to be dominated by the large state-owned companies that have carried over many of the old methods and practices of managing and operating companies from the socialist era. As a result, the market for industrial products is fairly well-developed in the region, in part by virtue of various government-sponsored export-oriented

----- Dr. Kwang-Yul Yum Swedish psychiatrist - "What are the qualities of reality which are most important for you as a person? ' In a book 'What are the qualities of reality which are most important for you as a person?' a psychiatrist, Dr. Kwang-Yul Yum, describes the unusual state of mind of someone with autism. "The qualities of reality which are most important for me as a person are the ability to perceive, the ability to sense what is going on, and then, the ability to have an image of what is going on." The answers of such people, he continued, have a characteristic structure of "symbols", "pictures" and "images" which they express. People with autism often reject such answers as being too obvious, and so, they try to express these qualities in other ways. The most important thing they do is to try to connect their symbols to the things of the world. One way of doing this is to show and try to share their drawings and paintings with other people. This is what I witnessed in the workshop. I don't think their psyche is different from the people with schizophrenia. The particularity of the stimuli creates a difficulty of sense of time and space, and this causes anxiety and depression. "Answers" such as "I want to have a good job and live in a good house so I can give you a lot of love" are not typical for an ordinary person. For such people, "gifts" or "doings" of the persons around are of the utmost importance. They cannot express their feelings of love and gratitude for other people. Their sense of time is very slow, and they are prone to develop chronic illnesses, anxiety and depression. The particularity of the stimuli is one of the most important elements in the theory of autism, but we cannot say that it is the sole factor. We can also say the particularity is a part of the definition of autism, the name of the entity, but it can never be the whole of the essence of autism. It seems to me that this person's psyche is close to the psyche of a person with schizophrenia. But, he is not schizophrenic because he is not really excluded from the world. He communicates
