Download The Ball Grabbers Episode Download Quicktime Ball Grabbers 5.15.16.--- abstract: 'We consider the problem of engineering a robot capable of learning a physical task from interactions with a human demonstrator. Recently, benchmarking studies have sought to compare the ability of reinforcement learning and evolutionary algorithms to learn such tasks from human-assisted examples. We present a new set of real-world tasks that can be learned by an (off-the-shelf) humanoid robot when presented with instructions. In particular, we consider learning to place and grasp a glass ball on an arm-shaped robot with a snake-like tool (i.e., snake bot). For comparison purposes, we also consider variants of this task for which the task performance can be predicted analytically (i.e., a baseline), as well as tasks where the task performance cannot be predicted with a high confidence (i.e., an hard-to-predict task). We propose to use labeled real-world tasks from the Robot Operating System (ROS) to provide the robot with the necessary information for learning and apply evolutionary algorithms, specifically the
