By making books not only available, but creating them as well, Metatext is producing a new type of historical work. Metatext is a new publishing model that borrows from both the classical and library book traditions. Today, few books are written directly from their source material in antiquity. Instead, most bibliographic research and interpretation is usually undertaken, followed by the writing of books in which all aspects of the historical work—from the preservation of primary material through the writing of scholarly commentary and the editing of the text—are handled by professional authors and editors. Sometimes, the work is commissioned by a publisher. In such instances, the publisher (or a commercial entity) may bring in a scholar to work on the text and produce an edited version, which it then publishes as a "stand-alone" book. This is different. Metatext books are not collections of edited versions of old texts. Metatext books are original works; the authors are scholars and editors as well as the original source. A metatext book is a work of scholarship, made possible by the digital age. Blending the aspects of classic scholarship and good editing, we aim to create books that: lend the feel of the original, ancient source, while adding the verisimilitude of professional editing, lend the feel of the original, ancient source, while adding the verisimilitude of professional editing, provide reliable, verifiable data on the source, are contemporarily produced, with the immediacy and access of new technologies, are contemporarily produced, with the immediacy and access of new technologies, are readily available. The cationic antimicrobial peptides (CAPs) are promising candidates for the treatment of bacterial infections as well as cancer, owing to their unique mechanism of action and their antimicrobial activity. However, CAPs have limited ability to cross the cell membrane and, for this reason, there are few therapeutic options for bacterial infections. Encapsulation of CAPs in lipid-based delivery systems can be an effective means to improve their antimicrobial activity. In this article, we review the most significant achievements in the design and construction of novel, lipid-based delivery systems for CAPs. The characteristics and behaviors of CAPs when they are delivered by lipid-based delivery systems have been discussed, with emphasis on bacterial membrane lytic action. Yeast have a large variety of sensor histidine kinases (HHKs), potentially allocating diverse environmental responses, which need to be finely tuned by enzyme kinases. These kinases contain small, catalytic domains and larger regulatory domains, the latter of which recruit the HHK by direct interaction. The proposed research involves a structural and biochemical analysis of the interaction between both kinds of domains, plus investigation of two highly divergent HHKs. Both kinases encode an ATP binding module, but their regulatory domains have significant sequence differences, raising the possibility that they have different mechanistic properties. The first aim is to
