Arkain's Final Cards Latest Post Tibor: I was thinking of starting a thread to help a group of people who have already bought Kurzick & had issues with it, including duplicate land cards, land text, mass actions, sounds, etc. I'd be more than happy to put the deck together for you, but I think it would be helpful if you payed attention to the... Tibor: Hey everyone, i'm a new player who first played Alcatraz a year ago but i felt it was complicated and the lack of information made me lose patience. This year i've decided to start with Unexplored and i've almost used all my possible resources. Here are my cards, i hope you find them useful....Photo: NBC

This is far from the first time I've sung the praises of Blossom, and I do so again with The Good Place. And not just because I'm a Shirley from Valley Girl liberal. The signs are everywhere, really. The show has amazing jokes. It gets me real, feels real, feels like real. It knows that, maybe through Derek Waters' character, Ted, who tells us early on that the show is comedy, that it isn't real, and that it's easy to offend, at the end of the day it's just comedy, comedy for the most important part: you. The show operates at a level where it knows how to do jokes and weave characters and make it all make sense as a joke. It's absurdly funny, never panders, and knows the point of any joke can shift from punchline to punchline. Most importantly, it gets you. The Good Place knows things are funny because there is someone within the joke to get caught up in the joke, be entertained by the joke, love the joke. Good times. So often, when a show works, it works because, when you watch it, you realize some subject is somehow being reconciled, that the show is making a point about something in a profound way, how to show something, live within something. You can usually tell this is happening in animated shows, which is maybe because animation, in its own unique way, allows the viewer to step into cartoon land, watch things from a safe distance, observe for yourself, here is how this cartoon uses the same idea of this topic or joke. Their jokes have gravity

Nationwide IPM Pilot project: diagnosis of onychomycosis by surface analysis. An automated surface analysis system (Autosal SCAN) has been developed for the rapid diagnosis of onychomycosis. Its measurement and classification accuracy of infected nails was compared with the reference method of mycological culture. We assessed the accuracy of autosal SCAN in the diagnosis of onychomycosis by analysis of the clinical data of patients with suspected onychomycosis. Samples were taken by cylinder from the proximal surface of the nail plate using a punch-type sampler and analyzed by autosal SCAN and plated to assess the presence of a fungal agent. Patients with a diagnosis of onychomycosis by culture and who were included in the study had clinical data collected, which included the basis of clinical diagnosis, patient age and gender, the site of infection, and the average number of months with the symptom. These data were then used to calculate sensitivity, specificity, positive predictive value, negative predictive value, and overall accuracy of the diagnosis of onychomycosis by autosal SCAN. Our results indicate that automated surface analysis was able to detect nail fungal agents, but this did not lead to a higher accuracy in the diagnosis of onychomycosis. Our study also showed that the percentage of women diagnosed with onychomycosis through this method was similar to the percentage of men. The sensitivity of the diagnoses was 69% for women and 62% for men, and the specificity was 73% for women and 74% for men. The positive predictive value was 74% for women and 80% for men. The negative predictive value was 65% for women and
