Skeletal muscle is under an intense anaerobic metabolism during activities such as sport or exercise. Consequently, a reduction in muscle cellularity, size and/or enzymatic capacity is expected when aerobic phosphocreatine formation is reduced. The red muscle mass to body mass ratio and/or the citrate synthase activity as well as the substrate oxidation rate during exercise have been examined to assess the anaerobic capacities of untrained individuals. In the present study, the same parameters were determined in skeletal muscle from endurance-trained individuals and compared to those from untrained subjects. No difference in the red muscle mass to body mass ratio was observed among the groups. Citrate synthase activities from the trained subjects were, however, significantly higher than those from the untrained subjects. The substrate oxidation rate during exercise was similar for the three groups of subjects. In conclusion, untrained subjects present a lower anaerobic capacity in the skeletal muscle than do trained individuals, despite a higher red muscle mass and citrate synthase activity. This finding might be related to changes in the distribution of capillary supply to the muscle fibres or to a remodelling effect in the muscle cells during endurance training./*
