there are six factions in galactic battlegrounds: republic, empire, separatists, hutt, hutts, and bandits. the six non-playable heroes are the game's hero units. the heroes can be used as the player's main characters as well as ai controlled heroes in the campaign. each faction has its own unique hero units, which plays a crucial role in the game. each hero unit appears on maps randomly, and the player's victory can depend on luck. the repulsa and resistance are the only two factions who don't have any hero units. in addition, heroes can be obtained as 'relics' from building or through special events. for example, heroes can be dropped by the sandtrooper on a point defense gunship map. each faction has three starting areas available on the map: a planet, a space station or town and a stronghold. players can choose one of the two types of planets, one that is an earth-like planet or a gas giant planet. the campaign can also be played on a space station or a planet. the star destroyer is the only structure available on every map. some resources like carbones are balanced to protect resources while others are balanced to protect units. resources are finite, and players are forced to specialize or suffer repercussions for straying from their normal strategy. units also have unique abilities that are balanced to influence the game, for example the rebel fleet's ability to flank enemies, and emperor palpatine's minions ability to tear down buildings. instead of one of the well known factions, the players are given the choice of six different ones that may be used in a random map game. the factions follow a similar design to the age of empires, but also had its own unique units as well as unique building technologies. all the initial six races, such as the xi'an, are a parody of the other peoples of the star wars universe (e.g. the tatooine slave races), and as such, their inclusion in the game is more of a reflection of the humor instead of the reality of their existence. some of the races have the only unique unit among the six different factions, namely the dug and camazon.
